ARL Rescues Injured American Bittern in Quincy

Bird brought to New England Wildlife for treatment

On Tuesday morning, the Animal Rescue League of Boston’s (ARL) Rescue Services Department was dispatched to Quincy to help an injured juvenile American Bittern, who was unable to get out of a fenced-in backyard.

Once on-scene at a residence along Harrison Avenue, rescue agents noted the Bittern’s leg/foot injury, which did indeed require assistance. Huddling under a bush, agents were able to corral the nervous bird and then safely and gently capture it.

While the bird prefers a freshwater marsh, it was brought to New England Wildlife in Weymouth for treatment and rehabilitation.

Part of the heron family, the American Bittern are common in the region, although loss of habitat has stunted breeding numbers. While you may not have seen an American Bittern, you’ve likely heard one, particularly at dusk or nighttime, as its unique song is quite loud.

ARL reminds the public that before you contact ARL Rescue Services, local wildlife rehabilitator or Animal Control, confirm that the animal is indeed injured. Often times young birds may appear to be hurt, when in reality they are just learning to fly.
